

A rapid participatory framework to elicit the different points of view about institutional, social, and capacity building context

Patrick d'Aquino (Cirad-Green)

I. Project strategy towards the institutional context: A pragmatic assessment

Who are the different partners the project wants to reach ?

Is there other people which have significant impact to allow project outputs ?

I. Project strategy towards the institutional context: A pragmatic assessment

Who are the different partners project want to touch ?

Is there other people which have significant impact to allow project outputs ?

Why each partner/people is so significant ?

II. Capacities needed to obtain the minimum aimed outputs: a pragmatic assessment

1) What minimum ecological output could be aimed?

For this minimum output, which minimum partners
must be reached at least ?

Partner x:.....

Partner y:.....

Partner z:.....

2) What minimum participatory output could be aimed?

For this minimum output, which minimum partners
must be reached at least ?

Partner x:.....

3) Therefore, which minimum "progress" (knowledge, practice, behaviors, responsibilities, power) we need about each of these partners?

II. Capacities needed to obtain the minimum aimed outputs: a pragmatic assessment

3) And, within the same frame, do you think some capacities or some constraints must be settled before the project?

1) Place these capacities within a sequential capacity building process

2) And afterwards (beyond the end of the project) which are the next capacities to obtain ?

So, the framework to exchange on day 1

- A "rapid participatory" appraisal...
- ...from your points of view,
- ...and about institutional and social context of the project
- In two parts:
 - Project perception of institutional context
 - Project perception of capacity building process
